

The Well at Tin Gnere

The Y-shaped stem holds a pulley, rope and bucket, which lower a man down to dig out the well, plastering the walls with sand-mud as he goes. Against incredible odds they have already dug this well to eighty meters!

Friends of Mali - Ireland

An Appeal by The Peoples of the World Foundation

Friends of Mali – Ireland (FOMI) was established in September, 2008 by Dr. Elizabeth Healy. FOMI is a voluntary, not-for-profit organization that promotes sustainable, community-based development projects in one of the world's poorest countries – Mali, West Africa. Among those projects is the conversion of a temporary, single-room school into a permanent, three-room school (with toilets and a teachers' room) for Tuareg students in the remote, Saharan village of Tin Gnere. This project is partly funded under our Institutional Education Grant program.

Tin Gnere is a newly-established village of recently-settled Tuareg nomads, whose decision to forgo their ancient, nomadic lifestyle was based on their desire to ensure that their children receive formal education. The village is extremely remote, lying about six hours into the Sahara Desert from the legendary town of Timbuktu. There is no electricity and no mobile phone coverage. It is a dawn-until-dusk task just to draw the water needed for everyday use.

In the past 3 years, the proactive people of the village have built around forty new mud-houses, received approval for employment of a teacher, constructed a small, straw hut for use as a make-shift school and they are gradually digging a new well. It has so far reached a depth of eighty meters but needs to be dug to 115 meters to ensure a constant supply of water.

Tin Gnere School

There are 150 children in Tin Gnere, ranging from 4 to 18 years old, who are eligible to attend the school. Since it can currently accommodate only 50 children – seated on the floor – most of the children in the village do not receive any education. The school has no desks, chairs or books. There aren't even any pens. In fact the only resources are a blackboard and a torn, faded poster of people visiting Niagara Falls.
